this report on central government s use of the government procurement card to pay for goods and services finds that when used appropriately it can be cost effective however while controls in five departments examined by the nao were operating as intended there is no up to date value for money case quantifying the benefits of the cards central government spent 322 million using government procurement cards in 2010 11 and 149 million in the first half of 2011 12 there were 1 75 million transactions in 2010 11 and 818 781 transactions in the first half of 2011 12 the majority of transactions were low value purchases with an average value of 184 in 2010 11 use of the cards varies between departments both in the amount spent and in the type of goods and services purchased some departments have inadequate management information and cannot monitor the use of the government procurement card effectively central data is incomplete and inconsistent and does not provide an accurate picture of spending across government there has been a lack of central government oversight of card use which has increased risks to value for money but the new central policy which defines minimum standards across government is an important move towards strengthening controls and ensuring greater consistency while departments acknowledge the risks and potential advantages of the card there is no up to date value for money case to substantiate this work by the nao has suggested that the cost of more traditional procurement methods may have fallen however using the cards could still provide a potential saving of around 35 per cent or 5 a transaction
